

ABSTRACT

In the current labour market, people will have to tackle a number of career transitions in the course of their working lives. Each individual will be responsible for ensuring that they remain employable in a socio-economic environment marked by uncertainty and instability.

Guidance at the Public Employment Service concentrates on preparing unemployed people to manage transition situations by promoting career management skills.

The aim of this report is to reflect on the guidance work with those receiving Social Integration Income and to analyse the role of the Public Employment Service in constructing the career and life projects of these individuals.

Keywords: employability, career management, guidance, social integration income, career transitions.
